Addressing inequality between groups is a core component of Leave No One Behind, the central, transformative promise of the 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development. Focusing on ethnic inequalities, this presentation considers policies that may encourage greater equality, and argues for more attention to the politics of their adoption and implementation. It draws on work from the Addressing Group-based Inequality project at UNU-WIDER, including new data compiled on affirmative action around the world.

Rachel M. Gisselquist is a Senior Research Fellow and member of the senior management team, United Nations University World Institute for Development Economics Research (UNU-WIDER). She is a political scientist and international development professional with two decades of experience in academia, applied policy research, and international research management. Her work, published in leading international journals, addresses inequality, ethnic and identity politics, development cooperation, the state, and governance and democracy. She holds a PhD (MIT) and Master of Public Policy (MPP, Harvard).
